

THE SCANNED BOOK

It was a dark and stormy night when the train arrived.

The station clock read half past eleven, and no one was about.

A single lamp burned above the ticket window, casting long shadows.

She folded the telegram twice and slipped it into her coat.

Beyond the tracks, the hills swallowed the last light of day.